Website type: Portfolio
Style: Minimalistic

In terms of structure, I'd want to have
- main page (plain white) with my name only

LIUBOV MOREVA

- in a top left corner, drop-down menu with three setions: - design for clients; - personal archive; - contacts
- <design for clients> section with my commercial projects would look like white page with rectangle tiles, and when you click on one of them, you'd have the pdf about the project opened but not on the full screen, only in the middle with the elements on the left and right darkened.

- <personal archive> section would contain my non-commercial design, something like this:

I think it would have to scroll once you click on the very right or very left, but we leave it till the times where I actually have more design projects. For now it will just be one page, and the idea is the same as with the commercial design section, where if you click on the image it would open, but not on the full screen, you will still see the interface of the website on the left and on the right slightly darkened.

- <contacts> would just be white page with two-three lines of my info
